Times Mirror Company Gives the Library Innovative Maps Painted by Hal Shelton

The Library of Congress has received more than 25 original hand-painted color relief maps created by one of America's foremost 20th-century innovators in cartographic design, Hal Shelton. The gift was presented to the Library by The H.M. Gousha Co., a subsidiary of the Times Mirror Company of Los Angeles. The donation was celebrated by a luncheon given in Mr. Shelton's honor, hosted by The Librarian of Congress, Daniel J. Boorstin, and supported by the Times Mirror Company and the H.M. Gousha Company at the Library on May 23. An exhibit, "Hal Shelton, Map Maker," in the sixth-floor foyer of the Library's James Madison Memorial Building

Chinese Study Group on Computers Visits the Library

A study group from China has visited the Library during a tour of nine American cities in a six-week trip to the United States, Canada, and Japan to examine various automated systems for possible use in the National Library of China's new building, now under construction in Beijing. Deputy Librarian of Congress William J. Welsh served as the delegation's host in the United States, arranging their itinerary and activities.

Led by Tan Xiangjin, Deputy Director of the National Library of China, the eight-member Study Group on Computers visited the Library from April 12 to 16. The delegation held discussions on the full array of automation activities at the Library and heard about the activities of the Optical Disk Pilot Program and the Preservation Office.

Mr. Welsh hosted the study group at a farewell luncheon in the Whittall Pavilion on April 16, attended by staff of the Library of Congress and United States Information Agency (U.S.I.A.) who assisted with the visit, as well as representatives of the Chinese press.

Contributing Editor to the Handbook Of Latin American Studies Dies

Roberto Etchepareborda, for the last five years contributing editor to the Handbook of Latin American Studies—prepared since 1945 in the Hispanic Division of the Library—died on April 9 of a heart attack in Fairfax, Va. Dr. Etchepareborda, born in Milan, Italy, in 1923, received a doctorate in law from the University of Buenos Aires and became one of the most prominent political and diplomatic historians specializing in 20th-century Argentina. He served several terms on the city council of Buenos Aires, was president of the University of Bahía Blanca, minister of foreign relations, and ambassador of Argentina to India.

Dr. Etchepareborda came to the United States in 1973 and taught at the University of North Carolina and at the School of Advanced International Studies of Johns Hopkins University. He was awarded a Woodrow Wilson fellowship at the Smithsonian Institution in 1974. He then served as director of the Department of Culture of the Organization of American States from 1980 to 1984. He was an unstinting supporter of several projects of the Hispanic Division, such as the microfilming of the Gabriela Mistral papers and the compilation of the National Directory of Latin Americanists. His most recent work was on a bibliography of the Falkland/Malvinas conflict.

Dr. Etchepareborda is survived by his wife, Maria Edith.

Barbara Collins' Labor of Love

Children are what mothers are.
No fondest father's care
Can fashion so the infant heart.
Walter Savage Landor, "Children"

The development of cultural and historical resources is one familiar to most Library of Congress staff members. But Barbara Collins (opposite), a library technician in the Collections Development Office, has taken these responsibilities a step further by promoting the development of human resources within her home. She is the single parent of seven foster children.

Her only explanation for this exacting choice is that she loves children. "It's a pleasure to me," says Ms. Collins, who began her employment at the Library as a card drawer in the Card Division in 1970. "Others think it's a headache. I liked working with kids when I was small. And I've always wanted a large family."

In 1973 while she was exploring adoption as an option to having children, she was advised to consider taking a foster child. A year later, after going through the necessary background investigation, she agreed to accept nine-year-old Linda and 12-year-old Yvonne into her home. Since then, she has been a crusader for the needs of foster children.

"Many foster children have emotional problems because they've been through some traumatic experiences. I get as much information on their backgrounds as I can so I know how to deal with their problems. They need a lot of love and you have to spend time listening to them and discussing things with them," she says.

The Collins' clan grew gradually, with William, the only adopted boy, joining the family when he was three months old in 1977 and Kim, an 11-year-old coming in the following year. By 1982 there were three more additions: Rona, then 10 years old, and Brenda and Carmen who were 10 and 14 respectively.

Although love is a staple in raising her children, Ms. Collins admits that at home she runs a tight ship. Upon arriving home from school, the children begin their homework or read a book if there is no homework to do. From 5 to 6 p.m. they watch the news and then write a news report which is left on Ms. Collins' nightstand for review along with completed homework assignments. They then check a list in the hall to find out what chores to do, such as taking out the trash or ironing.

"They have to learn responsibility and to think for themselves," she says. "I tell them they need common sense, book sense, and street sense."

As expected, Ms. Collins has experienced difficulties. The expenses of raising seven children are substantial, she says, even though some financial assistance is provided to the parents of foster children through the District of Columbia Department of Human Resources. At times, it is necessary to get professional counseling if a child has serious problems adjusting in the home. In 1980, she decided not to keep one 16-year-old girl who was unable to adjust satisfactorily.

As the children have matured, however, Barbara Collins is pleased with the fruits of her labor. Yvonne is now 23 and works as a beautician and part-time model. Linda is currently a sophomore at Norfolk State College in Norfolk, Va. She plans to major in special education, working with handicapped children. Kim is an honor student at Hampton University in Hampton, Va.

The younger ones are also doing well, according to Ms. Collins. Carmen no longer gets low grades on her report card, but earns B's and C's instead. And William, who was so severely malnourished when he came to the Collins' home that he could not raise his head, is a spunky eight year-old who attends a local private elementary school where his homework assignments include writing Japanese-style poetry.

Ms. Collins recently experienced further confirmation of her efforts when she learned about a letter written by Linda to the younger ones with the following advice: "Mommy might give a lot of lectures, but her lectures are important. You don't make mistakes when you listen to her lectures."

Concert Date Announced

The WRA Choral Society will present a Rodgers and Hammerstein concert at noon on Monday, June 17, in the Mumford Room, LM 649. The Choral Society is under the direction of Dorothy Zeiset.

Collections Development Office Holds Foreign Acquisitions Seminar

The Collections Development Office of the Library held the tenth in its series of Seminars on Foreign Acquisitions in March. The series was begun in December 1983 to review and assess the Library's acquisitions policies and their implementation on a worldwide basis, with the collaboration of the Library's Processing Services, Research Services, and Law Library Divisions.

The areas that have been covered in the first 10 seminars include Europe, Latin America excluding Brazil, East Africa, and East Asia. Seven more seminars are planned. Since several of the areas still to be reviewed are covered by Library of Congress overseas offices, the Collections Development Office will try to schedule the meetings when the appropriate field officers are in Washington.

While each of the geographic areas has its own special problems, many matters of concern were found to be common to most of them. Among the major recurring subjects discussed were: the importance for Library staff members to travel for acquisitions purposes; the need to explore the feasiblity of using local individuals on a contract basis, to make contacts and collect non-trade publications in areas where acquisition by exchange is difficult; the need to make special arrangements for the purchase of television and radio programs, recordings, and posters, and for acquiring publications of political opposition and emigré groups; the need for closer relations with the National Agricultural Library and the National Library of Medicine; the need to make microfilming and cataloging arrangements for pamphlets and other ephemera; and the importance of getting all materials under bibliographic control as soon as possible. Follow-up efforts are continuing to address all the problems that have been identified, through consultations and the development of new procedures.

The Geography and Map Division recorded Mr. Shelton's visit to the Library, making audiotapes of his remarks on his maps—which he had never before seen assembled in one place—and the proceedings of the luncheon, as well as an archival videotape of an interview conducted by Thomas K. Hinckley, professor, Brigham Young University.

Startlingly beautiful in their natural color and vivid representation of three-dimensional relief, Mr. Shelton's maps were designed originally for use by airline passengers. They were then produced as aerial navigation charts and widely adopted by pilots. The maps were also used as teaching aids in schools and colleges. So realistic are they, that they were used by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration to index photographs taken on early space missions.

"Mr. Shelton's technique of blending the artistic representation of terrain with modern scientific mapmaking is a truly unique contribution to American cartography," says John A. Wolter, chief of the Library's Geography and Map Division. Painted over a period of nearly 30 years, Mr. Shelton's maps are a unique scientific form. The colors have been applied with an air brush directly on grained zinc plates, which had first been etched with cartographic base information.

At the luncheon given at the Library, introductory remarks were made by The Librarian; Charles Schneider, group vice president, Information Services and Arts and Graphic Products, Times Mirror Company; and Congressman Norman Y. Mineta (D-Calif.). Following the luncheon, Mr. Shelton's achievements and outstanding contributions to relief portrayal were discussed by Arthur H. Robinson, professor emeritus, University of Wisconsin, Madison, cartographer, educator, and Honorary Consultant in Cartography to the Library (1974 to 1980), and Richard Edes Harrison, artist and cartographer whose maps have appeared in Fortune, Time, the New Yorker, and The National Atlas of the United States. The luncheon concluded with questions addressed to Mr. Shelton by the audience which consisted of distinguished cartographers, geographers, and map publishers.

With a career spanning some 47 years, Hal Shelton has established formidable credentials in the field of map-making. He was chief cartographic engineer for the U.S. Geological Survey's shaded relief map

He was also chief cartographic artist for the Jeppesen Company of Denver, Colo., for 36 years. During this period, he personally developed and prepared all of their Natural Color Relief Map Series, which covers all land areas of the globe.

Mr. Shelton is also well known for his depiction of mountain recreation areas and ski terrain in a series of spectacular maps and views of Colorado and other western United States ski areas.
